MASTERBATH TRANNY

VOL. 8647:
GENDERFUCKED

How have so many of us been convinced that inconsiderateness is inherent to intelligence?

Being an ass to everyone could just as easily be a sign of a lack of intelligence.

It takes intelligence to be able to hold others in your head, to consider how another person may feel or what their experiences may be, and how your actions affect those around you.

I have spent most of my life studying people, partially just so I can be good to them and communicate effectively with people who may be different than me.

Why is strength associated with cruelty and cold-heartedness?

It takes a lot of strength to stand up for others in front of those who would disapprove. It takes courage to love others, admit when you're wrong, and keep caring for humanity even despite its flaws. It's living on easy mode to be apathetic, and I often wish that I had such a luxury. The bliss of ignorance.

The fact that ignorance is "bliss" is a sneaky trap, because as many of us know it is not bliss. Knowledge is power. The knowledge that knowledge is power is power within itself. Would you rather live a life docile and subservient to authoritarianism, at the mercy of whoever tells you what to believe; or would you rather have autonomy, but the curse of knowledge and responsibility? Would you rather stay in a safe home remain a child forever, or branch out and face the world? I think a lot of the time, it's easy to feel like the former would be better. "At least I would be happy", but would you even know what happiness really is if you haven't known pain?

In Watership Down, a group of rabbits leave their home looking for a new place to settle. On their journey, they come across a place where all of their needs would be met. The other rabbits there have no wants, and don't even have to worry about predators. The problem was, it was a rabbit farm. They were being picked off, each of them blissfully munching on clover, awaiting their death.

Some say society has chosen to base the idea of "strength" on masculinity. I would agree, but not real masculinity; toxic masculinity. This is an important distinction to make, because when we don't, we are enforcing the idea that masculine men can't be progressive. We are saying that progressive=feminine, and therefore, a person cannot be progressive and masculine. This leads to masculine people feeling unwelcome in progressive spaces (such as feminist/queer ones), and progressive people of all genders/presentations feeling unwelcome in masculine spaces.

Why does being a "realist" mean nihilism to most people? Why can't reality be good? If we keep saying negative things and saying "I believe this because I'm a realist", that just means we are saying that reality has to be the most miserable option, and because we chose to believe the most miserable truth, we must be realistic. But how do we know what truth is, especially in a time where all meaning of the word is being twisted and contorted beyond recognition? We are in a surreal time. The lines between reality and fiction are ever-blurred. Many people will talk about how surreal it is to exist through these times. Since reality is constantly being violated, it should be no surprise we are feeling this way. I am saying this to remind you that your feelings/thoughts are real, and you are not alone in them. One fascist method of control is making us believe we are isolated.

- Nihilism is the belief that not only is there no intrinsic meaning in the universe, but that it's pointless to try to construct our own as a substitute. Nothing matters.

- Existentialism is the belief that through a combination of awareness, free will, and personal responsibility, one can construct their own meaning within a world that intrinsically has none of its own. When nothing matters, everything matters.

- Absurdism is the belief that a search for meaning is inherently in conflict with the actual lack of meaning, but that one should both accept this and simultaneously rebel against it by embracing what life has to offer. In other words, to absurdists, we cannot lack the absurdity of being human, but rather the fact that humans are innately driven to look for meaning in an ultimately meaningless universe. Whatever stories we tell to give meaning to our lives are just that — stories, fictions. Nothing matters, and it's a waste of time to consider anway.

To those of you who I haven't given myself away to already, I am an existentialist. If there is nothing but the stories that we write, that is an opportunity for creativity, autonomy, and free will. Why wouldn't we write the most beautiful, extraordinary, brilliant story we could?

We ask ourselves how people could get behind a podium, microphone, or keyboard, lie, and be taken seriously. One answer is that many of us, even those of us who consider ourselves to be progressive, have accepted false "truths" that we haven't even thought to question. Some of us are afraid to question our thoughts. However, If we aren't willing to look at ourselves and consider how we could be wrong, then the "wrong" will always fester into something we cannot control. Because we won't even allow ourselves to believe it exists. One example is a white progressive not believing that they could still have racist thoughts after years of educating themselves. That individual will have racist thoughts as we all do. However, since they can't recognize them they will say and do things that are harmful to people of color. There's no reason to shame oneself for having fascist thoughts. We live in a world where we are bombarded with prejudice day in and day out. It's written into our school books, our laws, our fucking residential zoning.

I myself have said many transphobic (and sexist) things, even after coming to terms with my trans identity, due to my own internalized transphobia. Even in just talking about my own insecurities in a way that hasn't really been thought through.

Give yourself the grace to be wrong, if nothing else, in front of your*self*. Remember to strive for harm reduction over perfection. Lastly, no one wants to come to a revolution if there's no salsa.

It's the 19th of June and here I am still writing May. I have been writing and writing and I can't seem to get it all together to be able to make something readable. We are in chaos and things are happening so fast I can't give anything the necessary amount of attention, including the world being on fire. This will be a short zine, and mostly recent art of mine, so I can start working on June's edition. I have had to stick to mostly digital art because of my fibro. Don't worry though, all of you millions of Liberation for Maggots fans, because I won't be skimping you on the gore this month. I hope you enjoyed my ramblings. I know I need to touch grass, but it's always fucking rainy here.

Since I am not able to get all of my thoughts on paper fast enough, and so many wonderful people have already had these conversations, I am going to shout out some Youtubers and journalists who I think have really important things to say and are doing a fantastic fucking job of it. And what a wonderful coincidence that I cannot get my thoughts together this month, because with today being Juneteenth, I am going to start with some black Youtubers who I admire, and one of my favorite videos from each of them:

- Khadija Mbowe - Who gets to be a Woman in 'Women's Sports'? (I also like their video on Sabrina Carpenter)
  - Highlights the spectrum of sex, and how race and sexism are inseparably entangled. Khadija is a multi-talented and person, and even has music.

- Foreign Man in a Foreign Land - who gets to be "crazy"
  - Addresses racism within the field of psychology and how it extends to health care, the justice system, homelessness, etc. Foreign is a fantastic male role model and essayist.

- Kat Blaque - Is this fetish content…?
  - Talks about fetish/kink and the ways in which it can show up in social media through Ashton Hall's content, and also how content like his often caters to closeted homosexual men. Kat is a trans woman who does amazing social commentary.

- FD Signifier - Beyonce is Everything, and It's time to be honest about the Manosphere (on Signified B Sides)
  - Another fantastic role model and impressive essayist

- For news I recommend Erin in the Morning, who has (had?) a Tiktok account as well as a Substack, which is where she posts her full articles. She is a trans woman who does amazing journalistic work along with her team.
- Ty Turner on Youtube is a great resource for trans-related news. He is a great male role model, especially for trans men.
- Elliot Sang - awesome realistic yet hopeful takes and video essays. Elliot gets deeply philosophical in an accessible way.
- Andrewism - What if we ran a revolution like a business? Andrew has great revolutionary/activist advice
- Lily Alexandre - The Feminist to Far-Right Pipeline, and Trans Regret and the Fascism of Endings. Lily is a highly talented essayist and covers a lot of trans-related topics and questions.

I think I'm gonna start doing this in most issues from now on, because there is so much to say and so little time. I'm so glad I'm not the only one talking.

Republicans always talk about
What people do in the bathroom
Are they afraid they're not doing it right?
It's weird and gross and sick
Oh wait this poem is out of hand
Sorry… I'm autistic. Listen to this shit.

I have written poems while on the clock.
So yes, I've paid my taxes
Not that I'll see a dime of it back
With all the funding slashes

A bastard rhyme; imperfect rhyme
A rhyme still all the same
Not that anyone would listen to me
With these autism claims

I won't stay silent for press conference science
Being pushed by RFK
That Andrew Wakefield lost his license
For The Lancet in '98

And while we're on it, the Cass Review
Was found to be a fraud
But that hasn't stopped the fascist regime
From writing it into our laws

What is destroying families?
A mirror is where they should look
The true criminals aren't so tough to find
Just read a history book

But we know what this is really about
Eugenics. It's eugenics.
We are forced to serve a murder machine
That thrives on the unempathetic

"I would love to read some of RFK's lines
If only he could show it
I am not familiar with his work"
-Marianne Eloise, 'tistic poet

I have two degrees, worked in surgery
Played instruments and did gymnastics
I want these weirdos out of my business
And to pay their fucking taxes

LIBERATION FOR MAGGOTS 2: MACE

It's hard to believe it's only the 5th of February. After Trump's inauguration, it feels as if time doesn't make sense anymore. The constant chaos has altered the very nature of time. It feels like it's flying by... yet it hasn't even been close to a month, like it's stacked on top of itself in messy piles instead of laid out in order.

I shouldn't watch the news anymore, but it's hard to look away. Today, I was listening to Rep. Nancy Mace of all people. She has a history of using the word "tranny" like she's a child who just learned a brand new word, especially when it involves harassing her openly trans colleague Rep. Sarah McBride.

She didn't look like she was doing very good. She had boils raising up on her skin. They looked familiar... They reminded me of what happened to Higbie last month--I... I had convinced myself that was just lack of sleep. Things are really stressful right now and there's not even anyone to turn to because we are all going through it. Even the ones who voted for that hog are feeling it.

"USAID awarded $2 million to strengthen trans-led organizations to deliver gender-affirming healthcare in Guatemala," Mace said as her eyes appeared to be filling up with a strange white substance. "So to each of you this morning, does this advance the interest of American citizens paying for trannies in Guatemala to the tune of $2 million?"

"What does that mean, to 'pay for trannies'?" I chuckled to myself while still frozen still in front of the TV. She appeared to be drooling, or-... almost... leaking... the mystery liquid from the corner of her mouth. It continued to dribble as a couple of worms began their slow, methodical escape from her flesh and raised themselves from within her hair like the dead rising from the grave. They were all moving in perfect unison, as if they were sentient. Had these worms been dormant inside of her? Did she know about them? What were they??

Suddenly, an interjection—Virginia Rep. Gerald Connolly, the ranking Democrat on the committee: "Um, yes, the gentlelady used a phrase that is considered a slur in the LQBTQ community and the transgender community—and, now, let me please finish without interruption!" Connolly pleaded, but Mace shouted over him, when suddenly the camera was back on her, and she looked... Fucking insane. She had absolutely erupted in maggots. They were scrawling all over her, out of her, back under her skin. They were crawling out of her ears and nose, tumbling down her shirt onto her desk, each with a soft, flaccid pap. They were everywhere. It was disgusting. She was bleeding pretty badly, too, but didn't appear to notice or care about that or the worms that were turning her into a (questionably) living, breathing casu marzu. Nancy Mace, representative, world's first human-sized casu marzu.

"Tranny! Tranny! Tranny!" Mace shouted as she suddenly projectile-vomited the white substance all over the House floor. "Christ, Nancy! Can you at least not get it in my hair?" exclaimed Tennessee rep. Tim Burchett as he gagged off screen. Why does he make it sound like this has happened before? "Fuck! She got it in my mouth—it tastes so salty!" Speaker Mike Johnson sputtered. First time, I guess. "Shove it up your ass you faggot!" Responded Mace.

"Your mom has a cock in hell!!" Rep. Mace's head had turned completely around. Suddenly, the broadcast was switched to what was clearly a recording of the House floor from earlier, before they even started. I watched for what felt like forever... Until I started noticing that the video was on a loop. I switched the TV off. Online, all I could find were cleaned-up versions of what I had just witnessed. I thought that surely this time it had been crazy enough for me to prove to myself that I'm not losing my mind. I'm afraid something terrible is happening.

I know you see them too.
